

Andrew Jackson to James Winchester, January 30, 1815, from Correspondence of Andrew Jackson. Edited by John Spencer Bassett.

TO BRIGADIER-GENERAL JAMES WINCHESTER.1

1 Draft.

New Orleans, January 30, 1815

. . . . I have lookout Boats in pursuit. Whether the enemy will attempt any thing farther, or sail direct to Bermuda is doubtfull, he is too much shattered to attempt any thing serious. Nicholls and Woodbine may again vissit the appalachicola, and endeavour to stir up the Indians. Francis and Mcqueen being present and seeing their defeat—if they can get to land, will never unite themselves with the Britons, and I have no doubt but they will prevent any Indian war. I have no idea that Enemy will attempt Fort Bowyer, or your quarter Still you cannot be too well prepared or too vigilant.—adml. Cochrane is sore, and Genl Lambart crasy, they may in this situation attempt some act of Madness—if their Panic does not prevent it.